In "Bright Air, Brilliant Fire: On the Matter of the Mind," Gerald M. Edelman sides with the biologists who consider it a little parochial to suppose that the existence of the universe depends somehow on brain cells -- tiny sacs of seawater that developed the ability to strike sparks of electricity when predators approach.

"Edelman Review" - Santa Fe Institute
In Bright Air, Brilliant Fire, Gerald M. Edelman accomplishes what seems to be an almost impossible task: He helps the non-scientist to understand the connections between what is known about the mind with what is beginning to be known about the brain. For Edelman, this subject "is the most important one imaginable" because it is charged "with ...

The brain is like the immune system. Both recognize external influences and respond to them. A type of memory is present in both brain and immune cells. The analogies between the brain and the immune system have been a topic of Gerald Edelman's writings for about 20 years. Apart from his more recent...
