Dinner with the Cannibal Sisters by Douglas Clegg

When the cannibal begins to consume the guest, he first eats his legs and then moves on to breaking his arms and consuming them as well. This is symbolic of the power of the people being taken away from them. Basically without the arms, one is powerless and defenceless. The next area targeted is the chest as the cannibal goes for the heart.

Dinner with the cannibal. For our Seminar my group analysed the poem 'Dinner with the cannibal' written by Witi Ihimaera. When I first read this poem I was very confused how it had anything to do with New Zealand. I read a few stanzas and was expecting the punch line that would make it all come together but there was none.

Dinner with a Cannibal is a terrifically well-written, exhaustively researched, and frequently chilling story of humankind's ancient and modern murderous consumptive behavior. Inspired by her master chef father, and plentifully versed in human prehistory, Carolee A. Travis-Henikoff previously wrote a highly praised cookbook, followed, naturally it seems to me, by this more anthropological dietary account.
