The sustainable development of farming and conservation of the associated bird life may call for new approaches that harmonise socioeconomic interests with nature conservation in a particular habitat, in a way that integrates conservation activities with farming practices.

Endangered birds and farming: new conservation strategy ...
Farming and Birds in Europe addresses the need for policy efforts to focus on both the concerns of conservation and sensible farm production in a timely manner. An opportunity not to be missed is at hand, and this book provides much of the importance in seeing that a sensible conclusion is reached, both for the needs of the farmer and consumer and for the birds and wildlife of the European countryside.

Apart from eggs and meat, many farmers keep guineas to protect flocks of smaller birds, such as chickens, and to reduce pests such as ticks and snakes on the farm. Guineaes are active foragers and love little insects like ticks, and they are fearless hunters when confronted with snakes. They won't shrink from mice or rats, either.

Like the proverbial canary in a coal mine, birds can be a sign of a healthy farm. I've come to realize, too, that our farm is home to so many birds and other wildlife, because for several generations my family installed conservation features on the land: trees and native prairie grass on CRP, but also several shelterbelts, farmstead trees, pollinator habitat, and a prairie grass strip on cropland.

Farming is the single largest land-use in Europe. It accounted for nearly one-half of the total land area of the European Union and is consequently home to many common and widespread birds, as well as those adapted to particular agricultural landscapes. However, until relatively recently, the conservation importance of farmlands went unrecognized.
