That permitted banks to engage in hedge fund trading with derivatives. Banks then demanded more mortgages to support the profitable sale of these derivatives. They created interest-only loans that became affordable to subprime borrowers.

What Caused 2008 Global Financial Crisis - The Balance

It is of little use to say the crisis happened because human beings, bankers and regulators, were not perfect. It is the height of folly to suggest that a solution rests in improving human decision-making next time. Only systemic change will generate a different outcome. I suggest there are six root causes of the financial crisis: Leverage. Excess leverage is at the center of all banking crises, by definition.
