During an intercultural marriage, you must learn to respect each other's culture and rituals. It comes with acceptance. And when you're accepting your partner's culture, then there is no need to question their logic. It is not right to put logic at the front all the time. Sometimes, let emotions lead to make this marriage work.

Intercultural marriages can feel like much more work, and can require much more personal sacrifice, than non-intercultural partnerships. But this line of thinking can be unproductive... I meet just as many non-intercultural couples who face disillusionment and frustration as I do intercultural couples.

Community wise intercultural marriages connect families that may have different views. This in turn helps in building up a better society where every person has mutual respect for each other's customs. These marriages help in learning misunderstandings that may have crept in. They enhance the understandings and the appreciation towards others.
